A journal of medical humanities

Uniting healthcare with culture

This three-year-old online journal is distributed at no charge to almost 100,000 people all over the world. It is published by the Hektoen Institute of Medicine with the purpose of exposing healthcare professionals to art, ethics, education, literature, medical history, and poetry as they relate to medicine.

Hektoen International is read by doctors, nurses, therapists, pharmacists, social workers, technicians, students, and patients. It features articles on the medical humanities from a variety of authors from all four continents, but does not publish clinical studies. In its short existence the journal has received wide acclaim.

Correspondents from many countries have commented that indeed there is a great need for this kind of journal.

The journal is divided into four sections: new published articles; the gallery, a repository of artwork on medical themes; a library serving as an archive for documents and articles on a variety of subjects; and a section on links to many other relevant sites and organizations.

“This journal builds bridges between providers and patients; it brings together nurses, doctors, and the full panoply of healthcare providers. What I like most about the journal is that it is as interesting to the experienced practitioner as it is accessible to the interested novice.”

— MD, Professor
University of Chicago

We need your support to help us grow

The journal is directed at persons interested in the cultural aspects of the healing arts. Its purpose is to explore the rich heritage of medicine, to illuminate the beautiful and the noble, and to enrich the lives of its readers by exposing them to articles of high quality.

By supporting the journal, you will help maintain and foster this nascent international effort. Funds will ensure quality writers and worldwide, free online distribution.

Contributors will be recognized on hekint.org.
